Don't panic -- a catastrophic end to the fiscal cliff doesn't mean it's all over for America's slow growth experiment. The fiscal cliff is one of the most fearsome acronyms in Washington. It conjures up images of chaotic, last-minute action in the House of Representatives to rescue the US economy from the precipice, as lawmakers hastily scramble to resolve the year-end "fiscal cliff" that threatens to lop about $500bn (£290bn) from US GDP, and nearly 7 million jobs. The cliff was agreed as a solution to America's decade-long deficit problem by Obama and his fellow Democrats in Congress in the summer of 2010. But while this act of bipartisan political "bipartisanship" is almost unavoidable, it was never meant to act as a permanent fix. The fiscal cliff has always been an emergency measure designed to save the US economy from a looming recession. Yet the cliff looms as close to the US economy this year as it did in 2010. That's because Congress is now expected to do nothing about it. "This is the fiscal cliff all over again," says Julian Zelizer, a professor of history and public affairs at Princeton University. "But instead of doing something about it, they're going to delay it. But you can't postpone a recession." Once again, Washington's fiscal politics are playing out in a series of marathon sessions. But unlike last year, the endgame will be decided in the House of Representatives, where the Republicans hold a majority. The last thing the US economy needs right now is a political power struggle, a game of chicken between the president and the Republicans over whether the former should allow the latter to push through tax increases on the country's wealthiest Americans. Obama's compromise, which includes some tax hikes on the rich but not a rise in the "tax on the rich" that caused a revolt

She's won a Best Actress Oscar, and played arguably the greatest role of all time. She's made some masterpieces, and I think she'll be at the top of the list for decades to come.
