Listen to and play unlimited music from within the Seesu app. Just set the tracks, play. The present invention relates to bi-directional communications via satellites and more particularly to antennas for such communications.

Communications via satellites with moving spacecraft, i.e., spacecraft which traverse, or orbit, the earth in an arcuate path (as, for example, in the case of a geosynchronous communications satellite), are known. The spacecraft antennas employed to effect such communications are relatively large. A consideration of prior art spacecraft antennas, including relatively small parabolic antennas, reveals that they generally comprise at least three parts, that is, the front end (including its supporting structure), the boresight of which is pointed at the earth to effect communications; and a dish-like reflecting element, the boresight of which is pointed away from the earth to effect communications with a satellite at a given orbital position. The reflecting element is, in general, rotatable about the boresight axis of the front end. The more important communications signals, e.g., at VHF and UHF, do not penetrate more than a few meters in the earth. Such signals are therefore also impeded by overlying materials. The most commonly employed antennas of this type for communications with moving spacecraft are known as Ku-band (13,750 MHz) ground-fixed (GF) antennas. Such antennas are relatively large in relation to their operating frequency, and their operating efficiency decreases with increasing frequency. The Ku-band GF antennas are therefore relatively inefficient for communications with satellites in the geosynchronous or other orbit altitudes. The efficiency of communications via a satellite with such antennas is improved by employing a large antenna dish, resulting in larger and more costly antennas. These antennas are, moreover, quite cumbersome to move. The problem is aggravated by the fact that the spacecraft generally employ antenna reflectors of substantial size. An important object of the present invention is to provide a parabolic antenna, in particular an antenna for communicating with satellites in geosynchronous orbit, of relatively small size, and of relatively high operating efficiency. Another important object of the present invention is to provide an antenna of small size, in particular of small size in relation to the wavelength of the RF signals involved in communications with the moving spacecraft, for communicating with a satellite in geosynchronous orbit. Another important object of the present invention is to provide an antenna of small size, in particular of small size in relation to the wavelength of the RF signals involved
