Since you're trying to go to a specific place, that place will be a reference point in your flight path. If your target location is at the exact midpoint of your flight path, then it will be somewhere at the intersection of the two reference points that you defined. Since the GPS will only determine your position at the most recently acquired fix, you will not know what the reference points were when it was acquiring fixes. You might try using an API like Geonames.org. It would be easier to use a free API, but you might not have as good results. You could also use this to search for the closest airport. Science Science is part of what we do. Our scientists conduct experiments, measure and analyse data and come to conclusions, which are then often verified and validated. Our scientists also communicate their findings to the world – explaining the results and implications of what we've found, so that the world understands and appreciates the work we've done. A recent project was the Government's 2016 Science Quinquennial Review. It was led by Dr Carole Allen and Professor Michael MacKenzie. The main aims of the review were to identify which areas of science are growing and which are contracting, to summarise the outputs of research over the past five years and to outline a roadmap for the future. The report highlighted that the Australian scientific community is active and diverse, with scientists working in a wide variety of fields, at different levels and in all parts of Australia. The report also showed the level of productivity of Australian science is strong and steadily increasing.I noticed this when I opened the saved view of the map. Just wondering what is causing it.
