The investigation is continuingManual palpation and ultrasound assessment of the sciatic nerve in subjects at risk for diabetes and a family history of diabetes. To evaluate the diagnostic performance of manual palpation and ultrasound assessment of the sciatic nerve as a screening tool in subjects at risk for type 2 diabetes and to investigate whether a family history of diabetes is associated with more frequent abnormalities. Prospective cross-sectional study. University outpatient clinic. A total of 224 nondiabetic subjects (120 women and 104 men), including 160 subjects at risk for diabetes (102 women and 58 men) and 64 control subjects. The individuals at risk for diabetes were either obese (n = 86) or family history of diabetes (n = 74). All subjects underwent peripheral nerve ultrasound and an assessment of diabetes risk by a nutritionist. In addition, a trained nurse examined the sciatic nerve at the popliteal fossa using a standardized technique and in randomly assigned sequence. A neuropathy disability score (NDS) was calculated as a combined assessment of sensory perception and vibration sense. For each parameter, sensitivity, specificity, positive and negative likelihood ratios, and diagnostic odds ratio were calculated. For ultrasound-assessed sensory abnormalities, the sensitivities, specificities, positive and negative likelihood ratios, and diagnostic odds ratios were 100%, 63%, 1.09 and 0.97, respectively; for functional impairment (NDS score >0), the sensitivities, specificities, positive and negative likelihood ratios, and diagnostic odds ratios were 100%, 62%, 1.15 and 0.96, respectively; and for neuropathy (NDS score >0 or ultrasound-assessed sensory abnormalities), the sensitivities, specificities, positive and negative likelihood ratios, and diagnostic odds ratios were 100%, 67%, 2.29 and 0.97, respectively. All sensitivity and specificity values were statistically significant. Family history of diabetes was associated with a higher risk of functional impairment (odds ratio, 2.41; 95% CI, 1.20 to 4.85
