Vascular diseases such as atherosclerosis, hypertension, stenosis, thrombosis, and neoplasia have a major impact on human health. In response, many types of vascular devices have been developed to treat these conditions. A variety of vascular occluding devices are currently used or being developed for use in a number of applications. For example, balloons, darts, screws, and stents are all used or being developed to inhibit neointimal hyperplasia, to occlude or substantially reduce blood flow through vessels, and to provide structural support for treating vascular diseases, such as atherosclerosis. Vascular occluding devices typically include a catheter assembly that includes an inflatable member for occluding the vessel. However, the catheter assemblies are typically designed for use with a specific type of occlusion device (e.g., a balloon) and often require a relatively complicated set of additional equipment (e.g., guide wires and/or targeting device) to deliver the occluding device to the occlusion site. In some cases, the assembly is significantly modified to accommodate the delivery of the occluding device. Accordingly, there remains a need for effective and efficient devices and methods for
