Recent Posts Like Us On Facebook About me My passion for cybersecurity started at a young age where I used to make customized codes for my friends on Windows systems. I also used to manage my personal finances on my friends computers. When I was 14, I started using a MAC and that is when I started doing my own version of Mac anti-virus. After completing my studies at college, I still got to know more about security. I started my career as a security consultant at the age of 16 and over time. I have been part of several security advisory boards and I have been researching various security related topics. Being a kernel developer since 2003, I started developing Custom kernal modules as a newbie and then I spent years on building a C/C++ tool to analyse various debuggers. I created the Plugin Protector project. I am currently contributing to the project and developing new tools.

Defense Secretary Mark Esper on Wednesday said he will block the Pentagon's release of so-called "black budget" information, canceling a plan to do so that had been proposed in May by the Pentagon's internal watchdog. In a letter to Democrats and Republicans on the House and Senate defense appropriations subcommittees, Esper said he has concluded the disclosure of so-called black budget information will likely cause "considerable harm to our national security." The national security threat Esper cited is the risk that the public will know details about the Pentagon's secretive mission. The director of the Defense Department's inspector general, the deputy inspector general for monitoring, and other officials had advised Esper that releasing the requested information would threaten national security and cause "irreparable harm," he said. It's not clear what the "black budget" information includes, though previous reports have included information about the Pentagon's secretive projects, including efforts to detect and defeat cyberattacks. Esper said the Pentagon would only release information that is consistent with its reporting requirements under the congressional appropriations process. He also said he would recertify the inspector general's office before October so the office can continue to have access to similar black budget information. Esper said the Pentagon has exceeded its reporting requirements "on multiple occasions." "That includes the disclosure of nearly $700 million worth of black budget investment requests and reports to Congress on cybersecurity issues," he said. Esper said there are "broadly-held misconceptions about the black
