The long-term goal of this research program is to determine the molecular mechanisms involved in neuronal differentiation. This information will be used to develop new, more specific and potent treatments for degenerative disorders affecting the central nervous system. Using the model system Xenopus, we have developed a novel strategy for isolating genes that are expressed only at specific times during neural differentiation. We have used an expression sequence tag library to isolate Xenopus homologues of a human cDNA cloned by ourselves, which encodes a novel homeobox-containing protein required for the differentiation of early stage animal cap cells in vivo. This gene, termed Xn-ol-1, encodes a novel homeodomain-leucine zipper protein. Using a combination of in situ

hybridization and biochemical assays to study the expression pattern of Xn-ol-1 during XI.Xo blastula development,
