France's president, Emmanuel Macron, on Sunday said that "there will be no reason, in 10 or 20 years' time, why someone who is an Afghan born today will not have all the rights that are a citizen of France". Addressing tens of thousands of people, including more than 50,000 young people from disadvantaged backgrounds, at an annual Bastille Day parade in Paris, Macron pledged to deepen cooperation with Afghanistan. "We want more of your young people to come to France So if you want, you will know that you can come to France with your dreams, your ideas," he said. "There will be no reason, in 10 or 20 years' time, why someone who is an Afghan born today will not have all the rights that are a citizen of France. "We will be offering concrete aid in support of a peaceful solution to the conflict. We will continue to support the French forces ... This is an important project." Macron's tough line on immigration and Brexit have made him one of France's most popular figures, but his popularity has fallen in recent months. The 39-year-old leader of the centrist, pro-business En Marche (Forward) movement won last year's presidential election by a landslide, but is already facing disquiet over the country's sluggish pace of economic recovery. His party suffered stinging losses in legislative elections on Sunday.
