Annoyed by the fact that most of your friends are still on multiplayer, you've decided to start playing online only. However, unlike most of your friends who can just hop online, you must spend hours trying to figure out how to even play this game in an online way. You don't seem to know how to pick the right character or even how to control an online character. You literally just head to your friend's house to play together, then chat whenever you want to. You tell your friend to start playing and a few minutes later, you notice that your friend is suddenly silent. After not having any fun for 5 hours, you play along with what your friend tells you to do, even if you don't understand the action you're taking. While trying to be a good pal, you have also shut down your console over and over, and the internet connection seems to be very unstable. Needless to say, you're too excited to do anything about it. What's new:

Out Of Hell for iPhone There is a real danger in making a game that is free to play. I'm convinced I'm a member of a dying species. You see, I make games. Even I don't know how many games I make because I don't want to look at the expense of the business card. But I have a really, really hard time stopping making them. Even worse, those games are often good. I like making them even if I'm personally not all that great at them. We have a really wonderful community of people supporting lots of different games. I've always encouraged people to make games for the love of making them, so it was tragic when I first started playing one of my games and was instantly sucked into it and then convinced it sucked. We're only human, which is part of why I get exhausted trying to balance my own life outside of the game, plus my fellow programmers. And I know those games. Those ones are really fun. But they also get a lot of flak. Sometimes just for the name. I call them Lawnmower games because I'm from Texas. Nobody likes a cowboy. If I'm honest, the first Lawnmower

Games was the final straw in me trying to make healthy professional choices. Okay, be honest—the first Lawnmower Game: Battle Out Of Hell was never my first Lawnmower Game. There was Battle Out Of Hell and Lawnmower Mowing Simulator before I even knew about Never Beach. But Battle Of Hell was where I had to make a genuine choice. On one side, there was a story behind a strategy game I loved. On the other, my parents had paid a lot of money for my improvements to the laptop I was using and I wasn't going to bring home a broken machine that was less than my own. I'm still not sure what I did. I was tied in knots about the whole thing. Two years later, I still don't know what I did. This time I didn't have to weigh it against a lot of money. I don't have to weigh it against family pressure or my own ego. I could just throw up my hands and let it go if I didn't know what to do. I kept my options open, but I had no particular intent. It was, as far as I knew
