Field of the Invention This invention relates to the field of endodontics and, more particularly, to a direct access endodontic point of care tip for irrigation and delivery of medicament. 2. Discussion of the Background The predominant treatment for the disease endodontics and its constituent diseases is the removal of the infected tissue and the replacement of the infected area with a filling that will not lead to reinfection. The filling material can be a permanent or temporary tooth filling. This procedure is typically performed by a dentist and generally involves the placement of a gutta-percha point as a mechanical barrier to seal off the entry point for the bacteria. Gutta-percha points are typically made of either gutta-percha or a mixture of a polymerizable rubber compound and a diluent, used as a filler, that generally yield a low modulus material. The gutta-percha point can also be made of a high modulus material such as epoxy resin or polytetrafluoroethylene (PTFE). The gutta-percha point is placed within a root canal at the site where the tooth meets the alveolar bone. The gutta-percha point is generally pushed back into the canal as a loose fit, typically with light pressure applied with an instrument such as a lentulo or reamer. The guttering is generally made in such a manner to form a barrier that will not be able to slide out of the root canal and to prevent reinfection. While this treatment is generally effective, there are a number of problems with this approach. The points are generally not able to fit with very tight tolerances and therefore will not form a tight seal. In addition, the points can shift in the canal and are particularly subject to failure if the canal is overly shaped in an effort to be generous and complete in root canal preparation. The gut
