"Iron Lung" is a short-form horror game that retells classic ghost stories. While the genre has become a staple, "Iron Lung" feels like a return to the roots of the slasher flick, and it shows it in spades. "Iron Lung" tells its stories through a television camera that you are controlling as if you were watching a film from a remote control. You are tasked with navigating the living and deceased from one house to the next until the evil spirit can be trapped within a vial of liquid. You never actually interact with the ghosts, but merely watch them from a safe distance as they move through your perspective. As you play, the pace becomes quicker as you are tasked with finding your next victim before the ghost escapes. There is no checklist to follow, and no rules. By the end of the game, your carotid will be throbbing with tension, and the experience will leave an impact that may not be immediately evident upon completion. Game's Quality: "Iron Lung" is a short-form horror game that is both effective and terrifying. If you have ever had a sort of panic attack watching an old horror film, then this is going to feel like that, only way more intense. ## What's new in The Fable Of A Rabbit:

,#2 The Forbidden Arts: 1st Edition Introduction In antiquity, when all was wrong, the planets were right. Rule over nature and conquer it and you would correct all that had gone awry. But to the Greeks, the Chinese, the Japanese, the Persians and the ancient Hebrews, the planets were all the same throughout the night sky. They were objective witnesses. They ruled the heavens and the earth because they had all the answers — complete and specific knowledge of the nature of gravity, of cyclonic storms, and, most significantly, the macrocosm and microcosm of our true being within nature as a whole. All living beings share the same universal influences: gravity, electricity and geomagnetism. In theology, during the last two thousand years, heathen myths have been attributed to the planet in question, Mars, at different points in time. On the last day of time, the Sun will be best to Mars. Today's thought is that Mars is the most dangerous planet in the night sky. This planet, however, is a most resplendent planet of eternal light and power and none of our mistakes have deterred it from being perceived ever since it solidified out of the heavenly fluid oceans more than a billion years ago. As red planet of great spiritual and royal power, Mars passes through the heavens coming from a region of space (The Atlantic Zone) where the current state of human existence on Earth finds itself. The planet is a very masculine planet with crystalline structures. It is formed of magma, and its core is turbulent with mobile, fragmented, unstable patterns of energy. Its surface is a place of rolling, crumbling hills and valleys, and it is the Pleiades (Messenger) star system that sent forth light from its system and brought the human beings to Earth. The planet of Mars also plays a central role in astrology. It is the part of the life force of the entire astrological chart that determines the outcome of life for all humanity. Mars has been known to be the "altar of power" and it has been associated with the planet Jupiter, because Jupiter in its zenith is similar to the planet Mars. The Pleiades star system are also associated with Mars, as this star system is a range of stars in the constellation of Taurus. We are in the astrological sign of Capricorn and Earth, at the zenith of
