Partition Manager has a solid interface, better performance and the ability to support a wide range of partition types. Conventional three dimensional (3D) graphics processors or video accelerators, such as the NVIDIA 3D GPU Composer, allow a graphics designer to build a 3D scene that is displayed. The designer specifies the vertices of the 3D scene, and the graphics processor renders the scene from the vertex positions. FIG. 1 illustrates a prior art design flow. In step 102, a designer designates a scene graph, which is a collection of geometric objects and a set of associated attributes. For example, an object in a scene may have a position and a color and it may also be visible or invisible. The designer fills in the scene using the position and the color of the geometric objects, as well as any attributes of the geometric objects. In step 104, the designer applies a view transformation to the geometric objects in the scene. The view transformation, for example, may cause the geometric objects in the scene to appear from a fixed position and be displayed on a screen. In step
