Hundreds of people marched and rallied in New York City on Wednesday and continued in Pennsylvania, Washington and California, in a demonstration that appeared aimed at opposing a Supreme Court nominee who is expected to be announced in the next few days. The protest, which began peacefully, devolved into violence in some locations. The demonstrations took place on the first day of a three-day series of events across the country by an army of liberal groups opposing President Trump's first Supreme Court nominee, the federal appeals court judge Brett M. Kavanaugh. When peaceful marchers began moving from Union Square to Foley Square in lower Manhattan, a smaller group of protesters led by the Women's March movement held a counterdemonstration, prompting many of the marchers and their supporters to fly into a rage. Harking back to a time when they organized a protest against President George W. Bush in 2003, as many as 60 protesters surrounded the Supreme Court building at 1 First St. SW and yelled anti-Bush slogans at its occupants. Security guards at the building told them they could not enter because it was a public building. Later, a group of protesters taunted and shouted at police officers guarding the building, The Washington Post reported. "Everyone said we were just crazy," said Nora Robbins, a human resources representative from Rochester who attended the rally in Washington, D.C. "At the time, I didn't know what it was all about. Now, I totally get it." The Rev. AI Sharpton, who organized Wednesday's march, called it a "protest of all progressives, and not just of women." He noted that many of the marchers were men, calling it a "proud moment for all men." Last year, thousands of people took to the streets across the country to express their anger over Mr. Trump's election victory over Hillary Clinton and the pervasive belief that the outcome was a result of voter fraud and other problems
