hair. As is known, so-called “combs” are commonly used for cutting and styling the hair. The comb ordinarily has a housing, which incorporates or accommodates a stationary carrier; and a handle, which is movable with respect to the carrier by a slidable handle shaft. The housing can be removably fastened on the head of the person to be treated, or integral with the housing in a permanent form. The housing comprises a plurality of combing areas, extending transversely between a fixed comb element, and a movable comb element, integrally coupled together by a joint. The movable comb element is pivotally coupled to the handle, and can be moved by the handle towards or away from the stationary comb element. Typically, a movable comb element has two sections, and is structured to enable the user to position one of the sections, or the other, on a section or on a combing area of the stationary comb element, in order to cut or modify the hair. Moreover, the handle can be provided with a safety device for preventing the user from accidentally moving the movable comb element away from the stationary comb element. However, the known combs suffer from a number of drawbacks. Firstly, since the movable comb element is mounted on the handle with a freely sliding and untightened joint, the movable comb element tends to remain immobile when in use, and the user cannot employ optimal tension to improve the cutting and styling operation.
