Search The 100 Season 6 Episode 12: Adjustment Protocol â€” 30 July 2019. from the Trenches Making the case for effective communication They say that one picture is worth a thousand words. In the realm of health information exchange (HIE), the word picture is the patient. Although technically there is little difference between a patient and a patient record, the term “patient” is so commonly used in health care today that it has become shorthand for the term patient record. Effective health information exchange begins with a good communication strategy. In this article, I’ll provide a few pointers about creating an effective communication strategy. You’ll be learning about: What is patient-centered communication? The 7 goals of patient-centered communication What is the role of information technology (IT) in patient-centered communication? What are the success factors of patient-centered communication? Before you read this article, let’s first take a look at what patient-centered communication is, why it is important, and the 7 goals of patient-centered communication. What Is Patient-Centered Communication? Patient-centered communication is the practice of communication that puts the patient’s needs and goals first, keeping her informed about what is going on, what matters to her, and what options are available. It requires paying attention to her emotional and physical needs and the best ways to meet those needs. When I think about patient-centered communication, I think of 2 key aspects – the patient’s needs and goals and the best ways to meet those needs. These 2 aspects of patient-centered communication are represented in the diagram below. I can’t find a hard-and-fast definition of patient-centered communication, but some of the other definitions that I have found include: e-Privacy [Act of Parliament] (General Data Protection Regulation) (EU) 2016/679 general data protection regulation | | In-language education and training In-language education and training “The patient-centered care movement recognizes the power of language, and that it is a shared responsibility of healthcare professionals, patients, and
